I decided to become an accountant, partially because of my dad. He works in public accounting, so I kind of grew up around that world, and it inspired me to take some accounting classes in high school. During those classes, I really got to see how accounting is truly the language of business, and I really enjoyed seeing how the numbers could tell a company's story.

Because of this, I determined that pursuing accounting could open up a lot of different doors for me and help me become an asset within the business world.

One of my favorite things about working at SVA is the ability to help those around me problem solve. When people think of accountants, I think they generally think of someone sitting alone in a room doing the same thing over and over again, which is really far from the truth. Really, the thing that we do is we're helping our clients with a magnitude of situations that may arise. There's nothing more satisfying than working with our clients to solve a difficult issue that they're dealing with or helping them get started on a new aspect of their business.

One of my biggest professional accomplishments would be receiving the Elijah Watt Sells Award. I know most of you probably don't know what that is, because I honestly didn't know what it was until it was almost done studying for the CPA exam. But the Elijah Watt Sells Award is an award that's given out each year to any individual that passes all four sections of the CPA exam on their first attempt, while also receiving an average score of 95 and a half or above.

It's not something I like to talk about a lot, because I truly believe that anyone who can pass the CPA exam should be proud of themselves. However, when I look back on that achievement, it's something I truly take pride in accomplishing.
