I decided to become an accountant pretty early on. I had taken a couple business courses in high school and then in college, really got into the accounting courses. And then after doing my internship with SVA, I really knew I wanted to get into public accounting because of the variety and challenges that it offered.

I'm pretty flexible and I'm open to what works best for the client. Ideally what I like to do is meet with them face to face. You get a lot of quick responses to questions and things may come up that you didn't initially plan for in the beginning. So that face-to-face interaction is helpful, but I like to do whatever is best for the client. I can work remotely or talk over the phone, so that's how I really like to work with my clients.

What gets me excited about the work I do is a new challenge. Whether it's a new client or a new industry that I'm involved with, or even something new and unusual that happened with the current client during the year. I really like doing the research and tackling a new challenge that maybe we haven't dealt with before.
